the University Club not long ago to give a talk while the club members smoked. He was a nephew of Ralph Waldo Emerson, or

He was to discourse upon the Venezuelar abrogilo. Before the amoker he dined with "Now, see here, my friend," said the Doctor, when the coffee came, "Remember not to tread on my toes to-night in your talk or those of my esteemed Emperor. Promise me that you will be careful."

Mr. Emerson promised.
On his way to the club he fell in with Lionel Chambers. In fact, he was putting up at Mr. Chambers's rooms, for some reason or other. As you know, Mr. H. L. Chambers takes off his hat to the Union

Jack.
"Don't forget that I'm an Englishman," reminded Chambers, as they neared Grand avenue, "and be careful what you say tonight. It would not only be an unkind thrust on general principles, if you were to give Johnny Bull the worst end of your argument, but, by Jove, you're sleeping in my bed, old man, don't forget that."
Mr. Emerson again promised.

Mr. Emerson again promised.

When they reached the club Mr. Frederick Lehmann was introduced, as the gentleman who would present Mr. Emerson to the club. They conversed. Finally Emerson grew confidential.

grew confidential.

"I'm somewhat distressed," he said. "I "I'm somewhat distressed," he said. "I find that you have both German and English gentlemen here to-night, and what am I to do? I must touch on their side of the sifair, and how shall I ever get around the subject without giving offense?"

"Oh, just be funny," soothingly repited Mr. Lehmann. "Don't take a serious view of the situation at all. Treat it lightly and be as funny as you can."

"But wit isn't my line," plaintively deciared Emerson. "I'm dead serious, you know. However, I believe that you're right. I'll do my best," taking a few long breaths. "By the way (suddenly thinking of something), who gave the last talk here of this smoker variety?"

Mr. and Mrs. Louis Muligardt, who went Mr. and Mrs. Louis Muligardt, who went to England in January, have written to St. Louis friends that their stay of six months will undoubtedly be prolonged to twelve and possibly longer. Mr. Muligardt has com-pleted his architectural work in Manchester, pleted his architectural work in Mahonester, where he drew the plans for an enormous hotel owned by the Midland Railway peo-ple, and is now engaged on plans for a similar structure in London fronting on the

They have accordingly taken apartments in Regent's Park, the house, a superb mansion, somewhat in the style of the St. Louis Club, with charming grounds and a fine view from every window. They see much of the James Stewarts, formerly of St. Louis, who have a fine house in Portland place, West London, and entertain constantly.

Mrs. Mullgardt writes: "I met a delight-ful small American colony at Mrs. Stew-art's last at home, nearly all of the women wives of Westinghouse men, and it seemed very jolly to find some of the first acquaint-very jolly to find some of the first acquaintances my own countrywomen.

"Parliament opened with a grand celebration on February 17. The King and Queen are in town and the theaters very fashionably crowded, above all other places, owing to their Majestles' fondness for the pisI saw them both when they drove to the abbey in all their splendor, with a gilded coach, retinue of lords and ladies, and a gorgeous military escort. It was like the gorgeous military escort. It was like the coloring in a rare brocade shawl and a scene of the mediaeval period. I shall never forget its spiendor.

"The Queen looks lovely, remarkably young and is much beloved by every one. The King appears in splendid physical condition, with fine, healthy coloring, and has all the outward signs of a good-natured.

all the outward signs of a good-natured, elderly, English gentleman.

"The Englishwomen are very nice and I'm thoroughly prepared to like everything about them but their clothes. These awful fringes. Such countless numbers of fine, intellectual brows as I know must be concealed under that mass of front hair! Their narrow-shouldered blouses are heartrending; there is really no other word. I huy one of the largest size and then resemble a picked guines-hen when it is on. White straw sailor hais are the rage worn with fur-trimmed coats. penny bunch of violets, or a rose, sticks it in his buttonhole and goes on the happier for it. I must add a word about the Eng-lish 'Bobby,' for whom I have acquired the greatest admiration. The way he hendes this immense traffic with a mere wave of his hand is marvelous. 'Mr. Dooley' has recently arrived, and everybody is singing and whistling the tune. Grossmith has it in his 'Toreador' production, and each verse is followed by tremendous applause."

You have seen the "towel" shirt waists? Really, they're not as bad as they sound. I rather fancy some of them, and unless they get too awfully, awfully common, we may add one or two to our spring outfit with some degree of originality and pleasure. The toweis from which these shirts are made are of extra length and of damask huck texture, very soft and fine in weave, with lovely designs in fleur de lis, bowknots, lyv leaves, or conventionalized bowknots, Ivy leaves, or conventionalised flower patterns. The ends of the towels are hemstitched and are intended for the shirt fronts, which may be closed either by big white pearl buttons or enameled studs.

If you saw the Langtry gowns—and I hope you did for several reasons—you noted above all else the full skirts. They are upon us for good and all, and the coming summer will see no more of the tight, glove-fitting variety that has delighted the heart of the slim and the fat alike, for two seasons.

Mrs. Langtry's costumes and those of the ladies in her company were remarkable, not for their startling effects, by any means, but for their wonderful tastefulness and their color schemes. The pond-flly gown which she wore in her first act, of delicate green about the feet, growing more intellectual brows as I know must be concealed under that mass of front hair! Their narrow-shouldered blouses are heartrending; there is really no other word. I buy one of the largest size and then resemble a picked guinea-hen when it is on. White stray sailor hats are the rage worn with fur-trimmed coats. The hat is the kind that suggests I could die waitsin' wid you, Mag.' Awful!

"To complete this appropriate winter outfit the women wear open-work hose, startlingly embroidered in yellow, green, or magenta dots, and high-heeled, low-cut French shoes. What do you think of that for style, suitability and simplicity?

"The flowers that one can buy here at all seesons for the merest trifle astonishes me. The poorest and humblest panser-by stope."

The poorest and humblest panser-by stope in the first coor screen and more in her first act, of delicate green about the feet, growing more and more delicate and more and more and more shit color crept upward, was a pure and simple dream.

The blue crepe-chiffon was, by all odds, her most remarkable expression, surtorially. Langtry has beautiful blue eyes, which has been said many times before. She knows all about their blueness and the one tint of deep sea blue that is best calculated to bring out their finest and deepest coloring. Therefore, she chose that one tint for the gown of which i speak. The skirt was gathered full all round the waist, while a tracery of jet began half way down to the knees, covering the whole skirt, but not in any way confining the gathered effect. The let grew a bit beavier at the hem and as it swept outward to the train. The bodice, with all her gowns went wraps that cor of the gown. Really a most remarkable study in color-this gown. And so aptly chosen for its becomingness. Langtry has the dyed-lace craze, which the bridesmaids last week at the Parker-Hill wedding brought out in large measure. A pink crepe morning frock has three deep flounces, graduated, for the skirt trimming, each flounce edged with wide pink lace.

"Going to have cherries or currents, or some of those terribly new and smart green plums on your spring hat?" somebody asked Grace Flanagan last week. Grace Flanagan last week.

"None of 'em. Don't like to see food on hats." was the terse reply. "You might just as well wear pancakes or a small, ornamental beefsteak, and be done with it."

Miss Flanagan may be right, but how can we resist those fruits? Mrs. George Tansey came home from a shopping visit to Chicago, bringing a small toque of golden brown chiffon. On one side nesties the most luscious pink peach that you ever saw, in its long, siender, graceful, green leaves.

Miss Adele Melder took down to Eureka with her last night a big, flaring black soft straw, trimmed simply with folds of white lace, and a spray of white cherries across the front.
